Excerpt: . . . of 9000 to 10000 feet, but ranging somewhat higher as well as lower under favorable conditions. It attains its greatest size, thirty to fifty feet, with a trunk diameter of a foot to a foot and a half, on cool north slopes or in ravines at the upper end of canyons where snow lies late in summer. On a ridge east of Lamoille there is a fairly dense stand of large trees, and doubtless there are similar groves in the surrounding rugged country, but as a rule it occurs as scattered individuals not frequent enough to impart the dark hue common to timbered ridges. The name for it in the region is white pine. Engelmann, in Trans. St. Louis Acad. 2: 208. 1863, writes as follows concerning this species: On the Rocky Mountains, from New Mexico to the 49th parallel, occupying the subalpine belt,...
