Excerpt: . . . chapter xxviii navigation It is quite impossible in a single chapter to give more than a general idea of the art of navigation. An attempt will be made to describe only the salient points and leave the reader to follow up the explanations and details to be found in any modern book on navigation. Much of the art of navigation has been reduced to a science, and science requires accurate instruments for the purpose of collecting data to be used in mathematical calculations. Instruments used in navigation include the following: compass, chronometer, sextant, log, lead, parallel rulers, dividers, barometer. Every navigator should be supplied with a good pair of day glasses and a pair of night binoculars. Charts of the vicinity are of course essential. The above is not the complete outfit provided a modern man-of-war; it is the lowest minimum for navigation. Persevering...
